If you don't, then here's something you can learn from him when it comes to Niche Marketing: Soichiro Honda was always interested in learning about new technology. He read trade magazines, taught himself welding and experimented with many things. When the piston rings he made and manufactured were not up to Industrial standards, he returned to University. Every morning, he attended classes and as soon as class ended, he raced to his workshop and applied what he had learned. His piston rings gradually improved in quality and in time, he earned the reputation for producing excellent piston rings. Honda also predicted that oil supplies wouldn't last forever so he made small cars. As predicted, the oil crisis saw his "prophecy" come true. While many car manufacturers were suffering from the crisis as the general population became more savvy with the little oil they had, small Honda cars that were the misers in oil consumption became the darlings of motorists. "Nice Success Story, But What Has It Got To Do With Niche Marketing?" You see, the word niche is defined as "a special area of demand for a product or service" and marketing as "the opportunity to buy or sell".
