Attention: All parents who are encountering difficulties during their child's most crucial phase in life! How to Connect and Establish a Close Bond with Your Child During One of the Most Challenging Stages of Their Life - the Pre-teen Stage! Parents often encounter misunderstandings and communication problems with their kids during their pre-teen stage. If you can't get your pre-teen to cooperate with you, don't get frustrated! We have the right solution for you! Dear Concerned Parent, * Have you tried everything just to get through your pre-teens world? * Are you getting exhausted in talking to them because the tension between you and your child is just getting bigger? * Are you concerned about what they do, but can't find a way to talk to them without being misinterpreted? Parents start to experience difficulties with their children the moment they enter middle school. This is the stage when their used-to-be little children are beginning to work and think on their own. Subconsciously, they are practicing how to be independent and this is a major reason why there may exist a rift between parents and their children. But understanding your kids as they go through this challenging stage can be a breeze, if you know how! Keep in mind that no matter how disagreeable and hardheaded your kids may become, this is but a phase. With the right amount of consideration, especially from you as a parent, you and your pre-teen can finally come to terms and establish a close bond. The most effective solution is to: Mold your children during their pre-teen stage, which is actually the most crucial stage of their lives. The pre-teen stage is a special phase when their ideas, principles, and ways of thinking are formed and molded, in preparation for their adult years. This is the stage when they start to think critically and more maturely. They are acting more intelligently than before. The pre-teen phase starts from age 10 to about 12 years old, usually when the kids are in middle school. During this stage, they are more inclined to stop thinking about Barbie dolls and superheroes. Instead, they are beginning to discover their own personalities and style and this is something all parents should be aware of. This is the stage when children want their parents to let them do things on their own. As a good parent, you have to slowly set them free. Don't be surprised if your child doesn't want to hold your hand anymore when going out to the mall, or if they don't like you to brush their hair or fix their collar as you used to. And they might not even want to be seen with you outside at all! But don't worry; there's a way to cope with all these changes! The moment you realize that these changes are showing, don't panic. Take hold of the situation by realizing that your role as a doting parent now needs to be redefined. Remember that these changes could happen overnight, so better expect it rather than be surprised. Your role as an authoritative parent has to change. Instead of ordering your kid around as to what they are supposed to do, think, or say, inculcate values in them. Don't just tell your kid to stop doing this or that. Instead, tell them the reason why they have to stop. Keep in mind that your kid wants to be regarded as a real thinking individual; so controlling your child like a robot would do both of you no good. And more importantly Respect your child's privacy. The pre-teen stage is that period when pre-teens don't necessarily want to share everything they know, feel, and experience to you like they've used to. If they need time and space on their own, give them that privilege. But don't stray too far. Always be around them for support. To guide you more regarding molding and dealing with your pre-teen, we have devised a comprehensive report entitled Parenting the Preteen: How to Mold Your Child During the Most Crucial Stage.
