It's pretty obvious that the Internet is here to stay. It's not just a passing fad; rather it has become a backbone of our modern society through which we communicate, conduct business, and entertain ourselves. Likewise, the Internet's "property" is becoming known as one of the hottest investment opportunities available. But what IS virtual real estate? I'm not talking about houses, hotels, or even office buildings... I'm talking about websites. Virtual real estate (VRE) consists of websites that occupy the World Wide Web, and just like real estate in the offline world, VRE can yield income for its owners. In the offline world, there is a wide variety of property types, sizes, and qualities... An upscale apartment complex on the nice side of town is a better property than the dirty and run-down slums of the inner city. A beautiful lakefront estate is a better long term investment than a mobile home in a trailer park. The same holds true in the world of VRE. Some websites are far more lucrative than others. Some bring their owners a healthy flow of long-term passive income, while others never become profitable. What makes the difference between profitable websites and unprofitable websites? While there are many factors that can affect a website's profitability, I've found that in general there are two key ingredients that must be combined to create a successful site...
