Setting up your email is a bit like setting up a new computer: You do it only once. After you configure your email accounts in Windows Mail, you never have to hassle with it again unless, of course, you open a new email account. Don't be confused. Before you set up Windows Mail, start by collecting the following information for each email account. You will need to enter this information during the setup process: Your email address and password. The type of email server your email service uses. The address of the incoming and outgoing email servers used by your email provider. Most people know their email addresses and passwords, but many people get confused when asked to enter information about email servers. This is easiest if you gather some basic information from your email provider before you begin adding accounts in Windows Mail. For more information please see this video.
